

To Fall in Love Again

Drew Nelson did not plan to talk with anyone that morning. He did not plan to make a new friend. He certainly did not plan to fall in love. He resisted all of Amys attempts to draw him out? at the hotel, at the airport, on the airplane? giving hurried responses and burying his face in a pile of papers. It was only when the flight attendant offered coffee, and a muscle in Amys back twitched as she reached for it, and the cup tipped, and the hot liquid puddled in Drews lap that they began to talk. Earlier in the year, each had lost a spouse of over thirty years. Drews wife had died of a brain tumor, Amys husband when his small airplane nose-dived to earth, the engine at full throttle ? an accident, it was ruled. They live in the same city. Both have grandchildren. They are about the same age. Consciously, or not, they both are looking to love again. But relationships do not exist in vacuums. Drew is wealthy, and Amy is middle class. Amy is new in town she and her husband moved to Charleston twenty-five years ago while Drews family has lived there for three centuries. Drew lives below Broad, a code word for high society, old families, power, and money. Amys home is across the river. Class warfare may be less violent than it was in the past, but when Drew invites Amy to the St Cecelia Ball, battle lines are drawn. In a city in which ancestry is important, the balls membership is passed from father to son, and only those from the oldest families attend. Family, friends, co-workers all weigh in on their relationship and choose sides. Allies are found in unexpected places. Opposition comes from among those who were thought to be friends. Though they are gone, even their spouses ? through things they have done and things they have said ? wield influence in the conflict that follows. Amy begins to suspect that Drew is one of them, the rich snobs who despise her, while Drew concludes that Amy neither trusts him nor cares for him. As each questions the others motives, their feelings for each other are tested, and Drew and Amy are challenged to consider if they truly want to fall in love again. 300 character teaser Drew did not plan to fall in love that morning.
