

Never Tempt A Duke

He could not forgive her deception. She could not resist the desire they shared. When a scandal forces them to marry, their passions lead to dangerous secrets. Deverell regarded his beautiful bride dispassionately. He had begun to think-hope-he could find in her what he had never had before. That had disintegrated into ashes when she tricked him into marriage. Now, the wedding breakfast done, the revelry just beginning, she gave him a nervous glance from where she stood near the arbor. He returned her gaze, took note of the wreath of baby's breath and pink roses atop her head, the Belgian lace train cascading from her shoulders and draping loosely over her bare arms before falling to the hem of her gown, and felt nothing. She was beautiful; fairy-like; virginal. Deceitful. A changeling, he told himself. She had undergone so many transformations since he first met her that he wasn't certain who she really was. Except that now she was his wife. Deverell excused himself from Craven and strode to his bride; saw her instant wariness as he approached. The past fortnight had not endeared him to her, no doubt. Fitting enough, he supposed, since her actions had not endeared her to him either. So, my lovely bride, he drawled, taking one of her hands and drawing her away from her companions, I trust all has gone according to your wishes. Apart from the others, she tried to pull her hand free but he held it firmly. She flicked a glance at him from beneath her lashes, a maiden's trick that had never worked on him. He had ample time to study the female strategy. Yet he had still been conquered by treachery. A galling admission of defeat. If it had gone according to my wishes, your grace, she retorted, I would be quite far from here, I assure you. Somehow, I doubt that, my sweet, he said softly. He lifted her gloved hand to his lips as if to press a loving kiss to her palm and murmured, I think yo
