Sappho was a female poet philosopher who lived in the Greek Isle of Lesbos, around 630 B.C. She wrote sensual, erotic poetry about women and goddesses. Sappho's wisdom and celebration of the beauty of women is shown through her artistic work. Her yearning desire, wild passion and love are achingly portrayed. Sapphic Erotica is known as the eroticism of lesbians, named after Sappho. The word lesbian is derived from Sappho's home, the Greek Isle of Lesbos. Both words were used to describe female homosexuality by the 19th century. Alcaeus, a contemporary of Sappho described her as Violet-haired, pure, honey-smiling Sappho. The 3rd century philosopher Maximus of Tyre wrote that Sappho's relationships to her female friends were similar to those of Socrates: What else could one call the love of the Lesbian woman than the Socratic art of love? For they seem to me to have practised love after their own fashion, she the love of women, he of men. For they said they loved many, and were captivated by all things beautiful. Much of Sappho's poetry survived until the end of antiquity. Scholars at the Alexandrian library collected her poems in an edition of nine books, but this edition got lost during the Middle Ages. The surviving proportion of the nine-volume corpus is small but still constitutes an important and fascinating work of poetry. This Kindle book has been formatted by human hand, includes a linked table of contents and is illustrated with beautiful paintings of Sappho (who has inspired many artists). Enjoy! Your enticing laughter that indeed has stirred up the heart in my breast. For whenever I look at you even briefly I can no longer say a single thing, but my tongue is frozen in silence; instantly a delicate flame runs beneath my skin; with my eyes I see nothing; my ears make a whirring noise. A cold sweat covers me, trembling seizes my body. I love the sensual. For me this and love for the sun has a share in brilliance and beauty. Again love, the limb-loosener, rattles me bittersweet, irresistible, a crawling beast. As a wind in the mountains assaults an oak, Love shook my breast. For by my side you put on many wreaths of roses and garlands of flowers around your soft neck. And with precious and royal perfume you anointed yourself. On soft beds you satisfied your passion. And there was no dance, no holy place from which we were absent. Come and lift my shaken soul to the sacred shadow cast by Helicon's rustling forests; Sweep on wings of flame from the middle ether, Seize and uplift me; Thrill my heart that throbs with unwonted fervor, Chasten mouth and throat with immortal kisses, Till I yield on maddening heights the very breath of my body. Come to me now once again and release me from grueling anxiety. All that my heart longs for, fulfill. And be yourself my ally in love's battle. I would much prefer to see the lovely way she walks and the radiant glance of her face than the war-chariots of the Lydians or their footsoldiers in arms.
