

Tainted Love

A figure of medium height and build, clad in faded jeans and light blue t-shirt sat up on the lumpy mattress. He lit a cigarette and stared at the photographs strewn about him on the bed. Five years we've been separated, he thought. You're busy with your careers; a play writer, an entrepreneur, a teacher and a secretary. You're enjoying life, while I was locked in a hospital, having every corner of my mind probed. He took several drags from a cigarette, turned to the window, then to the pictures. I loved you, once. I suppose I still do, but you hurt me. You sent me to that hospital with your lies. God does not like liars. He has spoken to me. He has given me permission to punish you. He crushed out his cigarette and lit another. Ill do it in my own way, in my own time. First, Ill be watching you. Then, when the time is right, I will do Gods will.
